Activity: A is Hit, B is Night, and C is Window

Activity Format: A, B, C
    C, A, B
    B, C, A

This activity was difficult as it was hard to show the same content in three different panels (three windows, three hits, three nights). I found myself repeating panels, looking back if I had access to “22 Panels That Always Work” I believe I would have done this activity differently and attempted more variations in my panels.
Rebecca

Ow!!

Who the heck attacked me so late at night?

That's why my rear end lives...

Julia

Home run!

[School]

Yeah, I have a window of free time.

Can I have a kiss?

Sure.

She's a window! No widow!

Response Gallery 19: In-class Wordless Improv Comic.

In-class Improv wordless comic
In class, we did a wordless improv comic with the following set of rules:
0) Draw a page with seven panels
Panel 1) Draw something that sets the scene and the mood...
Panel 2) spot an Object in your room, and incorporate it into the narrative
Panel 3) Some sort of message from off panel, mediated through a device, out a window, something - is received (still wordless) and causes excitement/elevates dramatic tension.
Panel 4) A flashback - what happened before
Panel 5) Draw characters/scene in silhouette Panel 6) Close-up
Panel 7) Wildcard... finish however you want...
For this in-class activity the constraints of the number of panels and the contents of the panels created an interesting storyline I would not have created otherwise. I will say that the time constraints of each panel made me fall behind in the activity. The speed at which I sketch out comic pages is something that I would like to improve.
Wordless Comic

At this point we started discussing comics that tell quality stories except without the use of words.

When I think of life without words I start to pay more attention to sounds. So for this comic I decided to show a character breaking silence with his beautiful music playing.
When I was reading the articles about wordless comics, I saw several artists who used wordless comics to cover hard topics. So, I tried to cover something that was more on the dark side for this assignment. I may have used too many words, but I tried to use them as little as possible and without word balloons.
Wordless Comic

This comic was about generational trauma. Though I think it may be too abstract to read clearly.
